The tumor-necrosis factor (TNF) superfamily member IFN-alpha/beta is a multifunctional cytokine with inhibitory effects on various types of viruses, including herpesviruses. The anti-viral mechanism of IFN-alpha/beta is unique and distinct from that of type I interferon (IFN-alpha/beta) as well as the other members of the TNF superfamily. While IFN-alpha/beta directly suppresses the replication of virus, the anti-viral effect of IFN-alpha/beta is thought to be mediated indirectly by triggering the expression of interferon-stimulated genes. This review will focus on the direct and indirect anti-viral activity of IFN-alpha/beta, focusing on the suppression of alpha-herpesvirus infection by IFN-alpha/beta. We will also briefly discuss the inhibitory functions of IFN-alpha/beta in other viruses and summarize the similarities and differences between IFN-alpha/beta and IFN-alpha in the suppression of herpesvirus infection. The new tactic is a departure from a longtime method of protesting that uses a smoky haze to block cameras. The smoke was once a tool of choice as a method of destroying equipment and impeding police investigation. But the tactic has been used by protesters and police to block each other's ability to record surveillance. A new method of protest began in New York City on Friday, where police officers in the Financial District used smoke machines to block protesters' ability to record surveillance.
