To access the new features, you'll have to make a certain number of changes to your Lightroom Preferences. In many cases, you only have to open the settings dialog once before you're all set. I recommend that you make sure you've configured your preferences, such as those shown in the graphic, and restart Lightroom. The most obvious changes when using Lightroom 5 are to the New Collections window interface. The tabs in the window have been replaced with color-coded section headings — orange = the Catalog, beige = Library, and green = Folders — that you can also see in the previews of images you're browsing. Even though I'm used to the old navigation and way of organizing images, I feel compelled to look for hidden features everywhere. While I'm still getting used to the new tabs at the top of the window rather than in the sidebar as in Lightroom 4.3, I'm finding I don't have to search for the old functionality. I haven't found anything yet that Lightroom 4.3 couldn't do. Mac means a lot for Apple and many of us so the fact that the company let this one pass us by is a bit disconcerting. A big single reviewer insisted that the big blue Retina display was not a significant factor in the decision. Surely someone will address that before it goes too much further. When it comes to the software for professional photographers, I think the number of options is overwhelming. Most photographers who are looking for a good and basic RAW editor should check out the Adobe Lite presets. The nominees that make up this set of presets are not bad and they don't require much R&D from the developers. I would recommend the Photoshop Design series and the Creative Production series. If you want to be one with the latest and greatest, then you'll probably want to try LayerMixers' Photoshop. But unless you really need all of the features that this one has to offer, it's probably unfair to expect that any single application can offer all of them.

Fashions change; trends come and go; the ever-changing nature of the Internet means that brands need to be on point and keep pace with change. And the world is crying out for better, faster ways to create. The tools that enable designers to work more quickly, collaboratively and flexibly are a combined boon for brand communications. And now we have them. This year's event will focus on how digital media is used to communicate, inspire, entertain and sell.
