Multilocus sequences reveal evolutionary relationships within and among the Anolis carolinensis species group. Anolis lizards are a well-established model system for studying evolutionary processes in a squamate. Comparisons of mitochondrial and nuclear DNA data show that all currently described species form a monophyletic group with high levels of phylogenetic support. However, inferences of evolutionary relationships among species are not always strongly supported by morphological data alone, suggesting that intraspecific variation may play a role in the genetic structure of anole species. Therefore, I have sequenced five nuclear loci and one mitochondrial locus to examine the evolutionary relationships of anole lizards within the A. carolinensis species group. These data provide further evidence for the monophyly of the A. carolinensis species group and do not support the current suggestion that the West Indian anoles A. geckos and A. laevis are sister taxa. The observed levels of sequence divergence between A. carolinensis species support both the designation of the A. carolinensis subgroup, and the existence of low genetic diversity within species. Sequence data for the A. carolinensis subgroup do not indicate that the Venezuelan Anolis species A. tegusinoi is the most closely related species to A. carolinensis, suggesting that some aspects of intraspecific variation may be different among species.

Events The Battery Monitoring Project is currently following a total of 3-4 species, primarily within the Atlantic Province of Massachusetts. At this time we have 7 Video Cameras recording, and 2 species with Camera/GPS Data. The following information will assist in the successful management of these endangered creatures
