This may be a critical element of winning a war, but it is also useful in civilian aviation. A flying aircraft at a low enough altitude may be struck by a cannon shell. Aircraft designed for civilian aviation may be tested to ensure that they can withstand such a collision. For aircraft designed for military purposes, not all aspects of the aircraft are redesigned for military purposes. In addition to reducing the design envelope of the aircraft, many military aircraft are configured with a radar cross section that is designed to minimize its detection. This may be achieved by adding exterior elements to the aircraft that add to its profile. The addition of such exterior elements may render the aircraft less attractive to private jet aircraft that use radar for air traffic control, thus rendering the aircraft unsafe for civilian aviation.

Therefore, an aircraft designed for commercial aviation may be desired that can withstand the impact of a projectile. This may include, but is not limited to, projectiles of different sizes, and projectiles having different mass. The aircraft disclosed herein is particularly effective in protecting an aircraft from cannon fire and projectiles of various sizes. For example, the disclosed aircraft may be configured to withstand a projectile of a size that is greater than that of a similarly configured aircraft that was designed for military purposes. In addition to providing protection from cannon fire, the disclosed aircraft is particularly suitable for protecting an aircraft from projectiles fired from a weapon system that is coupled to the aircraft. The aircraft disclosed herein is configured to withstand projectiles fired from a weapon system that is designed to avoid a radar cross section of a specified size. Therefore, the disclosed aircraft may be
